Forbes: World's Best Ski Resorts:

Val d'Isère, France

So why Val d'Isère? It is arguably the most user friendly major European resort, has a staggering amount of skiing, and gets the most reliable snow, a combo that is hard to beat. The icing on the cake is that Val d'Isère has long been the favorite spot in the Alps for British skiers, so it is totally geared up to the English-speaker, from waiters to ski instructors to rental shops, with no language barrier.

Val d'Isère is seamless - the town is at the base of the slopes, much of the lodging is ski-in/out or a short stroll, and while it is technically two connected independent mountains, Val d'Isère and Tignes (the combined resorts used to go under the marketing name Espace Killy, but now is simply Val d'Isère-Tignes), there is only one pass option, it covers everything, and as a visitor you never notice any difference.

It's very much like going to Whistler/Blackcomb, where the gondolas from the two mountains come down to the same central place and it's a matter of going left or right. Except that while Whistler/Blackcomb is by far the largest ski resort in North America, Val d'Isère Tignes is five times its size, simply enormous. While it's "only" the third largest ski resort in France, it's important to remember that France has the three largest ski resorts in the world, so that's saying something - most famous Colorado resorts wouldn't make a dent if superimposed onto Val d'Isère's map.

We are talking 186 miles of groomed marked trails and 78 lifts. The lift system is very modern, the most efficiently linked of all the French mega-resorts, with the smallest chairs being high speed quads, lots of 6 and 8 passenger chairs, plus an impressive array of gondolas, trams, moving sidewalks in tunnels, and even funicular-style railways that run right up through the mountain and can operate in any weather conditions. Given the enormity of the resort, it's shockingly easy to get around, and there are two high altitude glaciers at either end, ensuring skiing into the summer even in bad snow years. But by European standards Val, as they call it, doesn't really have many bad years and enjoys a reputation for having the Continent's most reliable snow cover, which is why early season World Cup races are held here every December (and the Downhill at the Albertville Olympics, a trail that is now the most famous run to ski). It sits higher, with base at 6,069' and 60% of the trails and 24,710 acres of ski terrain are above 7,200'. In addition, it benefits from an odd local weather phenomenon, the Retour d'Est, in which large amounts of precipitation come up from the Mediterranean, an event confined to Val d'Isère, the adjoining Maurienne Valley, and a few smaller Italian resorts. Last month alone (January 2018) nearly 19 feet of snow fell in just six days when the Retour d'Est visited. On top of all this, Val also has the largest snowmaking capacity in Europe, covering 40% of the terrain.

Val d'Isère stands out among European resorts for its sheer scope, reliable snow and the user-friendly, turnkey nature of the resort, and the last element is about to get even better. The town itself recently started a massive 5-year, 200-million-euro upgrade to expand the village and more seamlessly connect its pedestrianized core with the slopes. This is the largest construction project in the French Alps in the past 20 years and will basically add a slopeside neighborhood with new hotels, apartments, and 100 more private chalets. Up on the mountain, next winter will see yet another vital new lift, a 10-person, 10-million-euro gondola serving both the slopes and the highest altitude hotel in France. The new Refuge de La Solaise will open in December, a luxury boutique hotel transformed from the original 1942 summit cable car station, with 360-degree panoramic views, 10 bedrooms, 6 apartments, spa, a 380-seat restaurant and huge sun terrace.

If you want to experience the best of European skiing, Val d'Isère is a great choice - and it is only getting better.
